THE EATER BEATER

"Hey, gang," Bertie called with excitement, as he joined a group of his small friends. "Good news! The bakery in the next block has put out a whole lot of stale bread for little birdies like us to eat."

"Whoop-ee!" Billie trilled. "They don't usually have much bread left over. Let's get down there and have a feast before the big birds in the neighborhood hear about it."

"Yes, especially Blackie the crow and his gang of big eaters," Sammy Sparrow echoed.

Twittering with excitement, the group of friends winged toward the bakery.

"I have a good idea," Bertie announced, when they had reached their destination. "We'll never have time to eat all of this before some of the big birds show up. Let's carry the pieces back to our nests. It'll certainly be worth the effort."

The other birds quickly agreed to this plan, and soon the air was busling with fluttering wings.

But before the tiny birds had made more than a few trips, a big shadow swooped down among them.

"Blackie!" Bertie scolded bravely. "Don't you dare try to steal our food. We found it first!"

"Who, me?" Blackie said with sly innocence. "I wouldn't dream of swiping your food. I just thought you might like some help moving it to your nests. I'll go get the rest of my gang to help, too."

"Don't let him do that," Sammy begged Bertie. "You know perfectly well he's just planning to get his gang so they can have all the food for themselves!"

Bertie nodded, and his bright little eyes searched for something to help solve their problem.

"Just the thing!" he thought, as he saw a stack of large pieces of bread.

"Say, Blackie," he called, "you're always bragging about what a big appetite you have! Well, I don't believe you! I'll bet you can't even eat all those big pieces of bread over there."

"Issatso?" Blackie retorted. "Well, I'll just show you. But don't any of you try to sneak away with the rest of the food while I'm eating!"

"We won't," Bertie promised, winking secretly to his friends to follow his lead.

Blackie fairly pounced on the stack of bread and gobbled it up in short order.

"Marvelous! Wonderful!" the small birds chorused, following Bertie's prompting.

"Oh, that's nothing. I could eat ten times as much if I wanted to," Blackie boasted.

The crowd of tiny birds trilled and twittered with admiration, begging Blackie to give proof to his boast. They brought all the larger pieces of bread to him, and he fell to eating with an eager will.

Sometime later, huffing from his exertion, Blackie staggered away from the bread.

"No more. No more," he panted. "I can't eat another crumb."

"That's all right, Blackie," Bertie twittered. "You proved you have a huge appetite. Now you can go get your friends!"

"Not me!" Blackie cawed. "I'm so full I couldn't fly that far. I'm just heading for the nearest tree to take a long nap."

"Hurrah!" Bertie cheered with the others, as Blackie flew away. "That's one overrated, underhanded overeater who won't bother us anymore today. Now, let's hurry and get the rest of our food out of here before any more of his kind shows up."
